4. Comm. The act or system of insuring property, life, etc.; a contract by which the one party (usually a company or corporation) undertakes, in consideration of a payment (called a premium) proportioned to the nature of the risk contemplated, to secure the other against pecuniary loss, by payment of a sum of money in the event of destruction of or damage to property (as by disaster at sea, fire, or other accident), or of the death or disablement of a person; the department of business which deals with such contracts. Also called ASSURANCE (and in 17th c. sometimes ENSURANCE).

Assurance is the earlier term, used alike of marine and life insurance before the end of 16th c. Its general application is retained in the titles and policies of some long-established companies (e.g. the London Assurance Corporation). Insurance (in 17th c. in INSURE v. 4), but soon became co-extensive with assurance, the two terms being synonymous in Magens 1755 (see ASSURANCE 5). Assurance would probably have dropped out of use (as it has almost done in U.S.), but that Babbage in 1826 (see quot.) proposed to restrict insurance to risks to property, and assurance to life insurance. This has been followed so far that assurance is now rarely used of marine, fire, or accident insurance, and is retained in Great Britain in the nomenclature and use of the majority of life insurance companies. But in general popular use, insurance is the prevalent term. Mr. T. B. Sprague, followed by others, considers assurance, assure, assurer, etc., the proper words for the action of the company or persons undertaking the risk, insurance, insure, insurer, etc., for that of the person paying the premium. This would be in some respects a useful distinction, if it could be carried out; but it would leave the members of mutual societies at once assurers and insurers.

If this distinction be admitted assurance will signify a contract dependent on the duration of life, which must either happen or fail; and insurance will mean a contract relating to any other uncertain event which may partly happen or partly fail. 1848 ARNOULD Mar. Insur. (1866) I. i. 3 Marine Insurance... in its essential nature is a contract of indemnity. 1853 A. FARR in *Reg. 4. Math.

a. (of a function): That quantity of which the given function is the differential or differential coefficient (corresponding to the fluent of a given fluxion in Newton's method); so called because it may be regarded as the whole sum of a series of consecutive values assumed by an infinitesimal function (differential) of the variable while the latter changes continuously from any one value to any other. When such limits of variation are fixed or determinate, it is called a definite integral: see quot. 1877. An integral is denoted by the sign \int (originally a long s , for L. summa sum); in a definite integral the inferior and superior limits are indicated at the bottom and top of the sign, thus \int_a^b . (Formerly sometimes applied to the quantity from which a given 'finite difference' or 'increment' is derived, as in quot. 1763; cf. quot. 1831 s.v. INTEGRATE v. 3.) b. (of a differential equation, or a system of such equations): An equation or system of equations from which the given equation or system can be derived by differentiation. (In relation to a system of equations, any quantity which that system makes constant is sometimes called its integral.)

In a note to quot. 1817, Coleridge says: 'I am aware that this word occurs neither in Johnson's Dictionary nor in any classical writer. But the word, 'to intend', which Newton and others before him employ in this sense, is now so completely appropriated to another meaning, that I could not use it without ambiguity: while to paraphrase the sense, as by render intense, would often break up the sentence and destroy that harmony of the position of the words with the logical position of the thoughts, which is a beauty in all composition, and more especially desirable in a close philosophical investigation. I have therefore hazarded the word, intensify; though, I confess, it sounds uncouth to my own ear.'

Intent (intent), a. [ad. L. intent-us bent on (something), strained, attentive, earnest, eager, pa. pple. of intendere to INTEND; cf. OF. intent intended, attentive, assiduons.

Intent and intense are etymologically doublets, intensus and intensus being two forms of the L. pple.; but already in L. intensus was (like the simple tenus) more restricted to the physical sense 'stretched, strained', hence 'intense, violent', while intensus was extended to the notion of 'mentally or nervously on the stretch, intent, eager, attentive'. In the modern langs. this differentiation has been made more complete. So with intention, intension.

11. Logic. The direction or application of the mind to an object; a conception formed by directing the mind to some object; a general concept. First intentions, primary conceptions of things, formed by the first or direct application of the mind to the things themselves; e.g. the concepts of a tree, an oak. Second intentions, secondary conceptions formed by the application of thought to first intentions in their relations to each other; e.g. the concepts of genus, species, variety, property, accident, difference, identity.

The introduction of these terms is due to the early Latin translation of Avicenna, in which the Arabic مقولات maqūlāt 'perceptions, notions', pl. of مقول maqūl 'what is perceived by the intellect, intelligible, known', is rendered by intentiones. Thus tr. Avicenna Metaph. I, 2 (Prantl II. 321) Subjectum vero logica, sicut scilicet, sunt intentiones intellectæ secundo [المقولات الثانية] al-maḥ-qūlāt al-thānīyah, quæ apponuntur intentionibus primo intellectis [المقولات الأولى] al-maḥ-qūlāt al-ūlāyah, secundum quod per eas pervenitur de cognito ad incognitum. Hence in Albertus Magnus (1193-1280) Metaph. I, 1, 1 (Opp. ed. Jammy, Lugd. 1657, III. 3/v) Scientiæ logica non considerant ens et partem entis aliquam, sed intentiones secundas circa res per sermonem positas, per quas viæ habentur veniendi de noto ad ignotum. Pacius (Aristot. Organ., 1584) identifies intention with notio 'notion': 'prima notio seu prima intentio'.

Ep.* I. iii. 9 Not attaining the .. second intention of the words. 1852 MANSEL Notes Aldrich's Logic (ed. 2) 20 First Intentions, as conceptions of things, are predicable of the individuals conceived under them. Second Intentions are not so predicable. When Genus is said to be predicable of Species, it is not meant that we can predicate the one second Intention of the other, so as to say, 'Species is Genus'; but that the first intention 'animal' is predicable of the first intention 'man'; the relation of the one to the other being expressed by the second intentions 'genus' and 'species'. For this reason, Logic was said [by Avicenna] to treat of second intentions applied to first. 1864 BOWEN Logic v. 112.

|| Inter (intə'ɪ), the L. preposition = 'between', 'among', occurs in a few Latin phrases occasional in Eng., e.g. inter alia, amongst other things (less usually inter alios, amongst others, other persons); inter nos, between ourselves; inter se, between or among themselves. († Rarely with English object.)

Util.* 39 note, By the letters patent the governors include (inter alios) the archbishops and bishops.

Inter-, prefix. The Latin preposition and adv., inter 'between, among, amid, in between, in the midst', entered into combination with verbs, adjs., and sbs., as in intercedere to go between, intercedere, intercipere to seize on the way, intercept, interdicere to interpose in speech, interdict, interjacere to throw between, interject, interpōnere to put between, interpose, intervenire to come between, intervene: intercalāris intercalary, interdigitalis lying between the fingers, interfluvius flowing between, intermedius intermediate, intermuralis between walls; interamantium a place between rivers, intercillium the space between the eyebrows, intercolumnium the space between two columns, internuntius a messenger between, interregnum the time between two reigns, intervallum the space between two ramparts, interval. Some of these uses received great extension in late L. and the Romanic languages.

Of all these classes representatives are found in English, the earlier derived through French, the later often immediately from Latin. The Fr. form of the prefix is entre-, and it was with entre- or enter-, as in entrechange, entercourse, enterfere, that these words were taken into ME., and new compounds formed in Eng. itself: see ENTER-. But, between the 15th and 17th centuries, entre-, enter- gradually yielded to the L. inter-; entertain and enterprise, with their derivatives, being now the only relics of the earlier form. On the pattern of the words from L., many new derivatives have been formed from L. (or Gr.) elements; esp. the adjs. formed on the type (rare in L.) of inter-mūr-ālis: see 4 below.

In some cases English received from Latin and French both the simple word and its inter- compound: such are change, inter-change, commune, inter-commune, view, inter-view, column, inter-column. By extension from such compounds, inter- became a living prefix, freely used to form new compounds upon verbs, nouns, and adjs., not merely of Latin and French, but of native English origin, as in inter-twine, inter-talk, inter-brain, inter-tidal. Finally, the same process which produced such adjs. as anti-slavery, anti-vaccination, anti-war (see ANTI-4), has produced the adjs. inter-college, inter-island, inter-town, inter-university.

The following are the uses of the prefix as an English formative element.

1. In adverbial or adjectival relation to the second element.

1. Prefixed to verbs, participles, vbl. sbs., and ppl. adjs., to form verbs, etc.

These are entered here in the uninflected form as verbs, but some of them are exemplified only in the form of participles or vbl. sbs. As a rule, wherever there is a verb compounded with inter-, the usual derivatives (vbl. sb. and ppl. a. in -ing, agent-n. in -er) are possible. Some of the verbs may be regarded as formed from sbs., e.g. intercloud, dash-layer, mesh, net, word. The stress is on the radical element.

a. Denoting 'Between or among other things or persons; between the parts of, in the intervals of, or in the midst of, something; together with; between times or places, at intervals, here and there': as interbreathe (interbreathing vbl. sb.), -chase, -check, -circle, -cloud, -come, -crust, -curl, -dash, -distinguish (interdistinguishable adj.), -fillet, -flash, -forge, -gild (in pa. pple. -gilt), -insert, -involve, -layer, -lie (in pres. pple. -lying), -lighten, -mention, -pave, -peal, -receive, -rule, -set, † -situate, -smile, -sole, -squeeze, -tinge, -trace, -whistle, -word. With an intr. verb, inter- sometimes stands in prepositional relation to a following noun, the verb thus becoming trans. with the noun as obj.; as intervend (to wend or pass between).

Such formations with ENTER- are found in 15th c., and with inter- from 16th c.: cf. INTERPLACE. Words of this form are much used by S. Daniel c1600.

b. These appear in 16th c.; see intersalute in 1506, inter-justle in 1591. De Quincey (Logic Pol. Econ., 1844, 18 note) says: 'The late Mr. Coleridge suggested, and by his own example sanctioned, the use of the preposition inter for expressing cases of reciprocal action, or, in his language, of interaction. Thus the verb interpenetrate, when predicated of the substances A and B, implied that by an equal action and reaction, each penetrated the other. . . But, even as a justifiable English usage, it may be found occasionally in Shakspeare, and much more frequently in Daniel, a writer of the same age'. The stress is on the radical element.

c. With adjs. as INTERMIDDLE.

II. In prepositional relation to the sb. expressed or implied in the second element.

3. Prefixed to sbs., forming sbs., with the senses (a.) 'Space, distance, or part between . . .', esp. in architectural terms, after L. intercolumnium INTERCOLUMN, as inter-dentil, inter-joist, inter-modillion, inter-quarter, interspiral; also inter-world; (b.) 'Period or interval of time between', in words formed on the analogy of INTERREGNUM, as inter-papacy, inter-parliament. See also INTERKINO, INTERFILASTER.

The stress is on the radical part, but with a monosyllable tends to rest on inter-.

1823 P. NICHOLSON Pract. Build. Gloss. 586 'Inter-dentils, the space between dentils. Ibid., 'Inter-joist, the space between joists. 1723 *CHAMBERS tr. Le Clerc's Treat. 4. Prefixed to adjs. (originally, and most frequently, of Latin origin), in prepositional relation to the sb. implied (as inter-acinous, 'that is inter-acinos, between the acini': cf. ANTI-3, INFRA-1), or sometimes to a phrase consisting of the adj. + a sb. (as inter-accessory 'between accessory processes').

For the etymology of the second element, see the simple words ACCESSORY, ACINOUS, etc. Ancient Latin had only a very few examples of this formation, as intermuralis, interamnis, interdigitalis, interlunus, intermestris; but their number in modern times, chiefly since 1600, and esp. since 1800, is very great, and they are formed freely when needed. Logically they are composed of inter + L. sb. stem + adj. suffix; but, as the adj. suffix is the same that is used in forming an adj. from the simple word (e.g. national, inter-national, collegiate, inter-collegiate), they have the form of being composed of inter + adj., and in some later formations, as interhuman, intercapillary, interaccessory, intermolar, this is actually their structure. The main stress is on the radical part.

a. Denoting 'Situated, placed, or occurring locally, between or among (what is implied in the second element)': in modern scientific and other terms (chiefly of Anatomy and Zoology), as inter-antennal, -antennary (between the antennæ), interapophyseal, -capillary, -coralline (see CORALLITE 2), -corpuscular, -coxal (see COXA 2), -cuspidal, -cystic, -epimeral, -fibrillar (-ary), -fibrous, -filamentar, -ligamentary (-ous), -mandibular, -membranous, -mesenterial (-ic), -molar, -muscular, -papillary, -peduncular, -segmental, -spherical, -spicular, -staminal, -sternal, -systematical, -tentacular, -trabecular, -ureteral, -vesicular. c. Denoting 'Subsisting, carried on, taking place, or forming a communication, between . . .': hence, sometimes, 'Belonging in common to, or composed of elements derived from, different things (of the kind indicated by the second element)': as in inter-clerical (between clergymen), intercollegiate, -confessional, -denominational, -departmental, -human, -parliamentary, -personal, -racial, -regimental, -religious, -territorial. See also inter-civic, etc., in 6, and INTERCONTINENTAL, etc., among the main words. The prototype of this class was INTERNATIONAL (Bentham, 1780).

d. Loosely used to denote 'Situated, occurring, carried on, etc., between the parts or divisions of . . .', and hence erroneously 'within . . .' (properly expressed by INTRIN-): as in inter-asteroidal, -coccygeal, -cranial, -imperial, -mercurial, -parenchymal, -trinitarian: see 6.

5. Prefixed to sbs., forming adjs., with the sense 'Situated, distributed, occurring, carried on, plying, etc. between . . .': usually of communication, commerce, athletic contests, or the like: as in inter-bourse (between different stock-exchanges), inter-brigade (between brigades), inter-city, -class, -club, -company, -county, -district, -empire, -hemisphere, -island, -school, -street, -team, -town, -university ('varsity'), etc., etc. See also INTER-CELL, INTERSTATE (a 1845 in U. S.). b. Rarely, in the same sense as 4 b: as in inter-epidemic, inter-whiff.

These are app. all of 19th c. origination, and may be formed at pleasure. For their form and analysis, see what is said under the analogous ANTI-pref. 4. The main stress is on the radical word; but, when this is a monosyllable, tends to shift to inter-.

1. Of a day, days, or month: Inserted at intervals in the calendar in order to bring an inexact reckoning of the year into harmony with the solar year.

In the Jewish, Greek and Roman calendars, intercalary days or months were necessary chiefly to adapt the lunar to the solar reckoning of time. Since the reform of the calendar by Julius Cæsar (a.c. 46), an intercalary day (now Feb. 29) is required only once in 4 years; see BISSEXTILE and LEAP-YEAR.

Past.* viii. note, This intercalary line, (as it is called by the commentators,) which seems to be intended as a chorus or burden to the song.

3. Of the nature of an insertion between the original or ordinary members of a series or parts of a whole; interpolated, intervening.

There is much that is obscure in the history of this word, first as to the adoption of L. interest as a sb., and secondly as to the history of the OF. sense 'damage, loss'. No other sense is recorded in Fr. until the 16th c. As this was not the 15th c. sense of Eng. interesse, it is curious that the form of the French word should have affected the Eng. (see Du Cange), in the phrase damna et interesse, in French legal phraseology dommages et intérêts, the indemnity due to any one for the damage and prejudice done to him. Cf. OF. interest (1290 in Godef.) in sense 'damage', also recompense for damage done or caused, 'damages'. In sense 10 F. interest (now intérêt) occurs in Rabelais, 1535.

10. Money paid for the use of money lent (the principal), or for forbearance of a debt, according to a fixed ratio (rate per cent.).

Interest is paid at fixed intervals, usually once or twice in the year. Simple interest is the interest paid on the principal as lent. Compound (or compounded) interest (interest upon interest), is the interest eventually paid on a principal periodically increased by the addition of each fresh amount of interest as it becomes due and remains unpaid. Interest in this sense was formerly called usury, a name still applied when interest is charged at a rate beyond what is considered legitimate or just.

In med.L. interesse (Interest) differed from usura (Usury) in that the latter was avowedly a charge for the use of money, which was forbidden by the Canon Law; whereas originally interesse refers to the compensation which under the Roman Law, was due by the debtor who had made default. The measure of compensation was id quod interest, the difference between the creditor's position in consequence of the debtor's laches and the position which might reasonably have been anticipated as the direct consequence of the debtor's fulfilment of his obligation. This compensation was always permissible when it could be shown that such loss had really arisen (damnum emergens). At a later period, lucrum cessans—loss of profit through inability to reinvest—was also recognized as giving a claim to interesse; both cases appear to be included in the formula damna et interesse. The interesse was originally a fixed sum specified in the contract; but a percentage reckoned periodically, so as to correspond to the creditor's loss, was afterwards substituted (as sometimes in England in the first half of the 13th cent.). Interest in the modern sense was first sanctioned by law (though apparently under cover of the mediæval theory) by 37 Hen. VIII. c. 9 (see quot. 1545); this statute was repealed in 1552, but reenacted in 1571. (See W. J. ASHLEY Engl. Econ. Hist. Middle Ages II. 397, 466, and I. S. LEADAM in Dict. Pol. Econ., 1896, II. 429.)

[Note. The actual history of the words interlope, interloper, is somewhat obscure. Our earliest examples belong to the end of the 16th c. No form nor cognate of these words is found in any other language until after 1700, when the English sb. was adopted in Fr. as interlopre (Savary Dict. de Comm. 1723), now interlope, applied to a ship, and to a limited extent in Du. and LG. (enterloperen in Halma, 1758-61, enterloper in Bremisches Wbch. 1767). In Du. enterloper is expressly stated in 1768 to be 'van de Engelse ontleend', borrowed from English, and is explained to mean the same thing as the proper Du. term lorrensvaarder, used from the end of the 16th c. Interloper, intermeddler, stragglers, straggling Englishmen, occur as appellations of the same class of persons (see INTERLOPER 1 a, 1603, INTERMEDDLER c., 1601). Some of these synonyms suggest connexion with land-loper, 'vagabond, vagrant, straggler', in common use before 1580 in place of the earlier land-leaper (1362-1621), lope being the form of leap in eastern and some north-mid. dialects (= north. dial. loyp, loypf). It seems probable therefore that the two elements of interloper are identical with those of inter-meddler and land-loper respectively; at least, this seems more likely than that the word should have been compounded of the L. and Engl.

prefix inter- and the Du. or LG. lōpen, loopen to run, lōper, looper runner, a combination which could not well have arisen in England, and of which we have no historical indication in any foreign parts where English and Dutch traders came in contact. The earliest known references to the practices of interlopers are in connexion with the Russia Company; see Sir E. A. Bond's Introduction to Russia at close of 16th c. (Hakl. Soc. 1856) p. xxi. seqq. But the word soon became a well-known term in connexion with the trade of the East India Company, chartered in 1600.]

But by Lithgow in 1632, and from 17th c. in New England, associated with vale, in the specific American sense 3.

It is not clear whether the association with vale, valley, was, in the first place, one of popular etymology, favoured perhaps by the partial survival of the old variant form in -vale (cf. entervail in sense 2), or whether this was in New England a natural development of the sense, arising from the fact that the chief intervals in the primeval forest were the bottoms of the river valleys, and giving rise to an association with vale, as used in English in such names as the Vale of Clwyd, Vale of Llangollen, Vale of the Yarrow, etc. It is possible that both principles operated together; and it is to be noted that, in this specific sense, intervale has not, even in American use, ousted interval.]

Into (intu). prep. Also 1 in to, 2-3 (Orm.) in-to, 2-6 in to. [Orig. the two words, in adv., to prep., as in the similar collocations out to, up to, down to, away to, off to, on to, in from, out from, away from, out of, etc., in which the adv. expresses the general direction of motion, and the prep. specifies or has reference to a particular point or place. In the case of in to, the two words may refer to the same space, as in 'he went in to the house', or the to may refer to something which is in the space entered, as in 'he went in to the patient'; it is from the former of these that the combined into has arisen; in the latter the words are still written separate. But in early MSS. and editions this is often neglected; not only are the words often written separate when the sense is combined, but they are sometimes written in one, when the sense is the unconnected in to (a person, etc.). In in to, the n is long; in into the n is shortened by its rapid passage into the allied mute, l.]

General Sense:—The preposition expressing motion from without to a point within limits of space, time, condition, circumstance, etc.; the motion which results in the position expressed by IN, or which is directed towards that position.

In the Teutonic languages, as in Latin, this was originally expressed by the prep. in followed by the accusative or case of direction, and so distinguished from the simple notion of position expressed by in with the locative (or dative); but, when the case-endings were becoming weakened or lost in OE., so that the language was losing the power of making the distinction expressed in Latin by in aqua, in aquam, the periphrasis in to, into, was substituted for the latter. The other Teutonic langs., having retained the inflexions, esp. in the article and demonstrative words, have not required a parallel formation: cf. Ger. in dem (in) wasser, in das (in) wasser. In OE. into was usually, like the simple to, construed with the dative; but also, not infrequently, with the accusative, like the simple in (on) which it superseded, or the L. in which it rendered: see sense 1.

As the prep. in, partly from its OE. blending with on (see IN prep. 2), partly from its identification with L. in, had various uses now usually expressed by other prepositions, so into was formerly used in senses now properly expressed by unto, upon, towards, against, etc.: see II.

The earlier use of in to express motion died out gradually, so that there long remained (and still remain) phrases and constructions in which in has the sense of into (see IN prep. 30); conversely, in some dialects, and esp. in Central and North-eastern Scotch, into was extended to express position, and thus took the sense of in (cf. F. en, dans in, into): see III.

Iodine (ai'din, -ain), sb. Chem. [Named by Sir H. Davy in 1814, from F. iode, the name given by Gay-Lussac (ad. Gr. iōdēs violet-coloured, f. iov violet + -iōdēs like, resembling) from the colour of its vapour, with termination -INE³, as in chlorine.]

1. One of the non-metallic elements, belonging to the halogen group; at ordinary temperatures a greyish-black soft brittle solid with a metallic lustre, volatilizing into a dense vapour of a deep violet colour; in chemical properties resembling chlorine and bromine, but less energetic. Symbol I; atomic weight 127.

It exists in sea-water and mineral springs, and in sea-weed and many marine animals, and is extensively obtained from the mother-liquor of Chilian sodium nitrate.

1814 DAVY in Phil. Trans. 91 The name ione has been proposed in France for this new substance from its colour in the gaseous state, from iov violet. .. The name ione, in English, would lead to confusion. By terming it iodine, from iōdēs violaceous, this confusion will be avoided, and the name will be more analogous to chlorine and fluorine. Ibid. 92 It is probable that iodine will be found in many combinations in nature. 1826 HENRY Elem. Chem. I. 222 Iodine was discovered accidentally, about the beginning of the year 1812, by M. Courtois, a manufacturer of saltpetre at Paris. 1853 W. GREGORY Inorg. Chem. (ed. 3) 114 In power of affinity iodine stands below bromine, as bromine does below chlorine. 1862 ANSTED Channel Isl. 512 The source of supply of iodine is the seaweed growing on the rocks round the Channel Islands.

2. attrib. a. Containing or impregnated with iodine, as iodine fluid, liniment, ointment, water.

b. Of iodine, as iodine injection, vapour; esp. in names of compounds, as iodine monochloride, ICl; iodine trichloride, ICl₃; iodine pentoxide (iodic anhydride), I₂O₅. c. Caused by the action of iodine, as iodine fever, poisoning.
